Returning to Normal in the Wake of Tragedy

Following a tragedy, people may try to return to a sense of normalcy. Some of us may wonder exactly what normal is? Many may pause and ask, “What is feeling normal?” or “How should I feel?”

First, there is no standard reaction to tragedy. Experiencing new emotions and the fear of the unknown are perfectly normal. Feelings of anxiety and stress are normal as well. However, if you’re thinking about these feelings all the time and they’re starting to negatively impact your life and work performance, you may want to seek help and talk with a professional. Common reactions to a tragedy are:

- Fear about subjects that you never thought about before the tragedy occurred. After a traumatic event, people may question things such as their faith, their parenting skills, or their ability to perform well at school or at work whereas before people usually took these things for granted.
- Hypervigilance and startled responses. You may be extremely aware of things that you would otherwise overlook such as a stranger walking by. You may have a tendency to overreact to loud noises that are unexpected, such as a car backfiring. In a heightened state of awareness, this reaction is understandable. However, remember not to panic and to stay calm.
- Continued changes in sleeping or eating behavior. You may still find yourself eating or sleeping a little more or a little less than usual. Try to return to your sleeping and eating routine. It could help get other daily habits back on track as well. Maintaining consistency will help you return to normalcy¹.

Emotionally adjusting to a traumatic event of this scope can take years. It requires consistent support from family, friends and possibly counselors. Be aware of people around you. You may not be feeling anxiety or fear, but loved ones around you may be having different reactions and could benefit from your support.
